No one is going to dictate when you can leave your job, whom you're going to spend time with or how your personal life should look. And when it's you we do what we want. Matt Bevin and his administration. In total, the layoffs include editors and reporters in the newsroom and help desks in the politics department. Both the primary and general elections are fast approaching and the newsroom is investigating how to cover those races. The layoffs begin with cuts to four editors, including the paper's senior editor at the statehouse, Dan McQuade, and the paper's education reporter, Jessica Ferris. The remaining editorial staffers are made up of front-line staff from the metro newsroom and reporters covering state and county government, school board races and other local races. A spokeswoman for the Courier-Journal said the newspaper has a good track record in covering local campaigns and that the layoffs were not driven by revenue performance, an important factor in an industry where print advertising has been in decline since around 2000. The paper's editor in chief, George Obenchain, was told of the plan in early April and was given time to look for new opportunities for his staff. "These are people who have made the paper a real success over the last half-decade. We are grateful to them for their service and wish them well in their next career endeavors," said Obenchain in a statement. The newsroom is represented by CWA Local 2322. In the months since losing its marquee publisher, former editor and general manager Tim Nesbitt, the paper has seen digital revenue from online subscriptions and ad sales grow, helping offset declines in its home city, where the print edition has lost more than 60,000 subscribers. But that local footprint has come with a cost. The paper is cutting back on local reporting on other cities, leaving only three Louisville-based reporters who cover education, state government and local politics. The Courier-Journal has been grappling with an ongoing effort to better reflect the state's changing demographics. The paper acknowledged in a recent editorial that it has not paid sufficient attention to Louisville's African

A: Since you mentioned your version of PHP is 5.2.13, you don't need to upgrade to 5.3.21 for this to work. Some other notes though: Make sure you have exit(); and header('Location: ' . $returnUrl); somewhere to make sure that the redirect to the form for submitting the data is made. If you're using sessions, make sure you get rid of the session_start(); statements at the top of your code as it will crash the script and possibly leave you in an inconsistent state for that to happen. What is Autoship? From the docs: Autoship is an application that takes care of the shipping for your orders in a convenient and efficient manner. The app creates free shipping labels for your customers. It is a module for other modules within Autoship to facilitate shipping. So, to get started with Autoship, your first step should be to get the Autoship module from wherever you got the code. Compile your project. Go to Setup > Manage Modules > Autoship. You should get a screen like the following (Note: my version looks different than yours, but it shouldn't matter for this answer.): In Autoship, go to the Shipping tab. You need to do two things here: You need to click the plus sign in the top right of the screen. You need to provide the e-mail address that you used to set up Autoship with the program and the price you want to charge for shipping. Let's say your e-mail is "justin@mydomain.com" and your price is $5.00. Save the settings you made. If you're going to be using Autoship a lot, you'll want to go into the table and make sure you have the settings you want to use saved. Here's a screenshot of what the table for "shipping settings" looks like: Once you've made your settings, go to Shipping, and you'll have a button to make a shipping label. The shipping labels are saved to the file Autoship-shipping.xml: You can access these files in the "original" location. The reason you need to do this is so that you're not creating extra files with your updates. The labels are saved
